“ My brother Millard was a great big brother that I looked up too. He was thirteen years old when I was born. He moved with his father and stepmother, Nellie Jo Williams Britton in El Paso, Texas. I have said in recent days that he was the last person on earth to have known me my whole life. I remember him shooting marbles with me when I was very young. He would sit across the living room from me and shoot the marble across the floor and try to hit my marble I had in front of me. He was my protector, and I knew he loved me. When I was six, he joined the army. We would see him on family occasions and holidays and special events. the last few years we had a number of family reunions, and it was always special to see him. I will miss him very much.
